International short wave frequency chart

Search for International Transmitters This search allows you to enter a frequency, and find out which International Transmitter is probably using. The frequencies in this database start at 3000 kHz and end at 30000 kHz. This is the short wave frequency range. Remember, this is not a database of amateur stations, utility stations, air or sea services, etc. In other words, you will not find a list for 14255 or 1620. This database only covers the lists of the international shortwave transmission station. Insert the frequency into kHz. The interface will be updated soon, to allow more flexible search criteria. The data in this database does not come from ILG data. This is a compilation made by Tomas Hood (NW7US), using HFCC and other sources. The HFCC is a non-governmental, non-profit association, and a member of the international telecommunications Union in Geneva in the category of international and regional organizations. It manages and coordinates global databases of international short wave broadcasts in line with ITU's International Radio Regulations. Short-wave radio was by far the most widely used medium of international broadcast distribution only a couple of decades ago. In contrast to the rest of the radio spectrum, no acceptable method of assigning frequencies has ever been developed by the discovery of short wave propagation in the 1920s. The unacceptable level of reciprocal interference between stations, and an improved climate after the end of the Cold War led to the development of global coordination. The traditional delivery of international broadcasts is rapidly changing, with the advent of digital technologies and the Internet - this is widely considered the future of multimedia content distribution. At the same time there are compelling reasons to believe that the transmission fromterrestrial will remain an important guarantee of free and universal access to radio and TV programs, especially during the specific contextof listeners and consumers. Unfortunately, it has never been a thorough debate on this issue among international broadcasters. The HFCC is fully committed to developing a multi-platform distribution system in international broadcasts, where individual platforms do not exclude, but complement each other. It is obvious that consumers should be offered the full range of all existing technologies and should be free to select the best according to their individual circumstances. Read it. There is usually no problem in obtaining technical and program information on local broadcasts, but it is more difficult to get complete and accurate data of world short wave broadcast planning. The HFCC global database is outstanding as it is updated online. Individual times are sorted by both Broadcaster and Frequency Management Organisation. These times are now freely available on this site.
